Arthur Helton Global Human Rights Fellowship New York University School of Law

NYU School of Law announces with great pleasure the establishment of a new post-graduate fellowship for one year of human rights work. Applicants are invited to design projects to put their legal education to work on timely issues in countries where their efforts are most needed and where there are insufficient resources for human rights protection. The fellowship is designed to support students who have demonstrated a commitment to pursuing careers in international human rights law.

Project Guidelines

Projects should address human rights issues relevant to the host country in partnership with a host organization. Applicants will have discretion to design projects that tackle issues they and the host organization believe are timely and relevant, and that have the potential to have an impact.

Projects must take place in developing countries that are currently grappling with human rights challenges. Projects in Australia, Canada, Japan, United States, Western Europe and other similar countries will not be eligible. Applicants must have relevant language abilities for placements where English is not the working language.

In most cases, hosts will be local or national non-governmental organizations (NGOs). In exceptional circumstances, proposals will be accepted to work with international NGOs with offices in the country or with under-resourced state or inter-governmental institutions. It is crucial for the host organization to be committed to the project and to have the capacity to supervise the fellow and help him or her accomplish the project objectives.

Applicants should work closely with the host organization in developing projects, and proposals should be as detailed as possible. The selection committee is aware that many NGOs will not be able to predict their exact needs by the time applications are due and will consider the informed commitment of the NGO to work closely with the applicant and devote institutional resources to the project in addition to the substantive detail of the project itself.

Potential applicants are encouraged to meet with Sara Rakita, Associate Director of PILC, for help in selecting host organizations, designing projects, and preparing proposals.

Selection Process and Criteria

Applications will be due at noon on Wednesday, February 6, 2008 in the PILC office. Interviews will take place at the Law School Tuesday, February 12. A decision will be announced by February 28. The fellowship will begin in September 2008. Fellows will receive a stipend of $30,000, which may be supplemented depending on cost of living in the fellowship host country and the host organization's ability to support housing and relocation costs.

A selection committee comprised of human rights faculty and practitioners will review applications and select the Fellow. The selection committee may seek to supplement the application with information from the applicant or other informed sources.

Selection criteria include:

- Applicant's commitment to human rights as demonstrated by relevant internships and professional experience, coursework (including clinics), and extra-curricular activities.
- Qualifications of the applicant to implement the project.
- Quality of the proposal and potential impact of the proposed project.
- Relevance of the project to the applicant's career goals.

The fellowship is only open to graduates of NYU School of Law. Preference will be given to graduating 3Ls who have demonstrated a commitment to pursuing careers in international human rights, though LLM students and 2007 graduates completing judicial clerkships are eligible to apply.

Application Information

Applications should include 5 sets of the following materials:

- Summary page with name and contact information, one-paragraph description of the project, one-paragraph description of host organization, and total project budget amount.
- Proposal outlining the project (maximum 3000 words), including the following issues:
 - the human rights problems to be addressed
 - overview of project strategy
 - description of host organization, and support that host will provide
 - practical issues including necessary visas and permits
 - skills that the applicant would bring to the project (including language skills)
 - explanation of any challenges anticipated and how applicant would address those.
- Substantive letter of support from a senior staff member at host organization detailing proposed project, applicant's qualifications to undertake the project, the organization's commitment to the project and the role the applicant will play therein.
- Project budget detailing all costs including travel to project location, living expenses, telecommunications, travel within the country, and other relevant expenses. The budget should also include any resources the host will pledge (for example, if the host is able to provide housing, telecommunications, travel within country, or health insurance).
- Two letters of recommendation, preferably one from a professor at NYU School of Law and one from a former supervisor. (Note: members of the Selection Committee will not be eligible to write letters of recommendation but can be listed as additional references.)
- Personal statement setting forth the applicant's commitment to human rights, relevant experience, and career goals. (maximum 500 words)
- Applicant's resume and unofficial law school transcript.
- Supporting documentation such as additional letters, news articles, etc. (optional, not to exceed 10 pages).
